The Michael Faraday Community School is a flagship project for the regeneration of South London's Aylesbury Estate, the largest social housing complex in Europe.

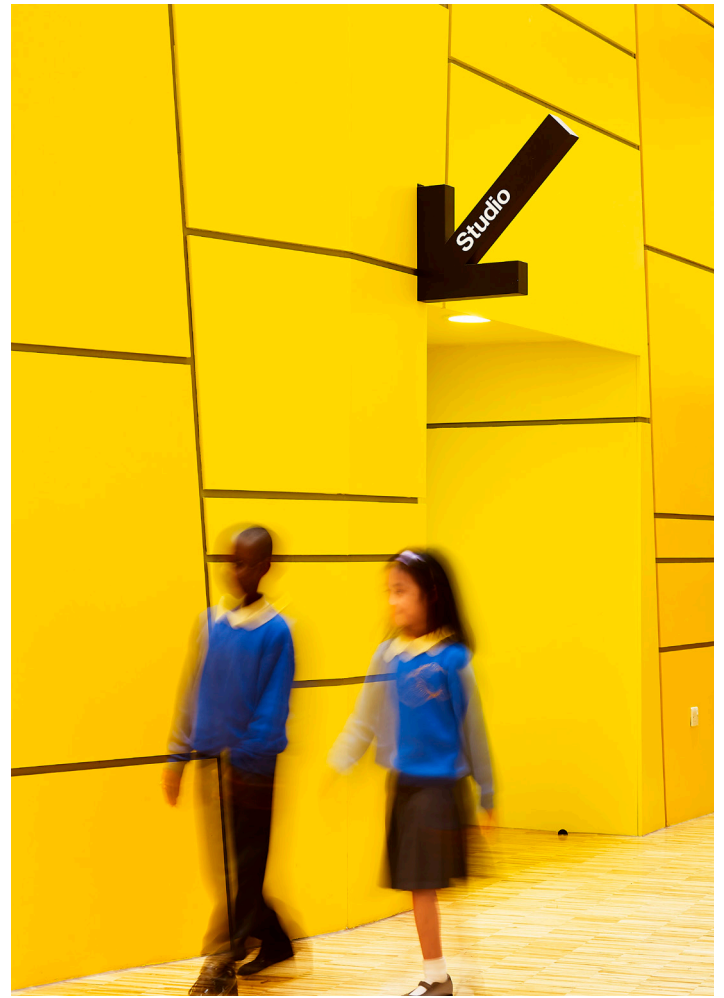

The objective was to replace the existing, cramped and inflexible 1970's buildings, located at the centre of the run-down estate, to provide a dynamic and innovative school, providing nursery, primary school, adult education and community facilities.

Cobal were appointed by main contractors, Galliford Try, to supply and install the wayfinding signage for the project.

Concept

The signage was an integral part of creating an environment that engaged the young children, engendered a feeling of pride in their school and integrated with the architecture and environment.

Outcome

Cobal made Cartlidge Levene's visually stunning designs a reality. Creating eminently practical results, featuring some truly innovative solutions. Internally, the signage takes advantage of the open spaces, with good sight lines granted by the imaginative footprint of the building. Large, coloured signs project from classrooms to identify year groups and playful, three-dimensional arrows identify the Studio and Roof Garden teaching spaces.
